

Rituals: The secret to effective knowledge transfer

When culture and worldviews collide, even a well-planned initiative to transfer knowledge can stall and fail in the key stages of relationship-building and information exchange. Prof. Anca Metiu, ESSEC Business School, uses research with the farming communities of rural Ghana to highlight the role of rituals in effectively facilitating knowledge transfer.

Related research: Relational Work and the Knowledge Transfer Process: Rituals in Rural Ghana, Mira Slavova and Anca Metiu, Organization Science, https://doi. org/10.1287/orsc.2021.1441

ISBN: 978-2-36456-250-9

An alliance with a purpose

Washington University in St.Louis OLIN BUSINESS SCHOOL

FGV

EAESP

College Dublin sity of Dublir

Trinity

THE 3 Ps IN A CoBS POD

• PERCEIVE with a set of key takeaways

> PROJECT with food for thought: on yourself, your organisation and the wider context

> > PERFORM by putting it all into practice using action tips

© The Council on Business & Society 2022, an alliance of leading business schools dedicated to educating tomorrow's responsible leaders. www.council-business-society.org

Printing authorised. No editing or re-dissemination allowed except with prior agreement from the Council on Business & Society. Contact: tom.gamble@essec.edu

• Knowledge transfer - or the transfer of knowledge - permeates the business world daily, from upskilling workforces to cross functional projects, to effectively managing international mergers and acquisitions.

PERCEIVE

- Transferring knowledge is complex: people and companies need to communicate sometimes large volumes of concrete information and facilitate this with relational work that creates links between the various participants.
- Problems can arise, and projects go askew if participants have a different worldview a different way of seeing reality and interpreting or understanding information that can stem from their cultural or professional background, values, beliefs and assumptions.
- Research from the NGO-farmer context in Africa shows that rituals and symbolic actions can facilitate knowledge transfer. These involve paying visits, affirming values, gift-giving, praying, performing, and storytelling.
- Rituals and symbolic actions set aside differences due to opposing worldviews, provide a model for collaboration, and enable new knowledge to be presented in a way compatible with participants' worldviews.
- These discoveries hold significance not only for Western organizations operating in Africa but also for teams, projects, mergers, and acquisitions outside the continent.
- Companies are filled with rituals, which can be either negative, aimed at silencing employees, or positive, utilized to resolve conflicts, acquire new skills, and promote innovation and performance. These rituals may take various forms such as salutes, pledges, commendations, or team-building exercises, among others.

Read the full research insight article in Global Voice magazine #25

PROJECT with food for
 Why should businesses and these rituals in their process would it bring to the compo
 What strategies could you stemming from cultural or p
• In what ways do negative r

- Why should businesses and organisations make an effort to instil these rituals in their processes of knowledge transfer? What benefits would it bring to the company/organisation's employees?
- What strategies could you employ to overcome barriers to knowledge transfer stemming from cultural or professional differences within their teams?
- In what ways do negative rituals within companies inhibit communication and innovation, and how can you identify and address these detrimental practices?
- On the other hand, how might positive rituals, such as team bonding exercises or walkabouts by top management, be utilized by managers to enhance employee engagement, creativity, and encourage positive dialogue?
- How can organisations leverage boundary objects or boundaryspanning agents (see above for definitions) to facilitate collaboration and knowledge exchange among diverse teams or departments?
- How might storytelling be incorporated into organizational practices to facilitate knowledge transfer and align diverse perspectives, particularly in the context of mergers and acquisitions or international collaborations?

Thoughts

_	Peds of putting it all into practice
CH	ECKLIST
	Assess company policies, practices, or rules that encourage or discourage knowledge transfer throughout the company.
	Identify and employ various boundary objects (ex: seating arrangements, diagrams, etc.) and boundary-spanning agents (ex: people who act as go-betweens, mediators, etc.) to efficiently communicate and facilitate knowledge transfer among diverse teams or departments.
	Organise a workshop session between the various stakeholders to identify their cultural maps and exchange worldviews. You may also like to refer to Hofstede's Cultural onion model.
	Set up meetings in each department to identify potential negative rituals (ex: mechanisms, organizational structures, or behaviours that restrict or silence voicing ideas and opinion) that may inhibit communication and innovation within the company. Take steps to address and replace these practices with more constructive alternatives.
	Set up a system of rituals within management. This may include paying regular visits to departments, holding meetings/workshops to affirm company values, and rewarding individual and department accomplishments.

Set up a system of rituals within other teams that promote innovation and collaboration and allow employees to acquire new skills. These rituals can include team-building exercises, incentive programs, internal mentorship programs and cross-functional training workshops.

Integrate storytelling into organizational practices to facilitate knowledge transfer and align diverse perspectives, particularly in contexts such as mergers and acquisitions or international collaborations.

Schedule regular meetings to continuously assess the effectiveness of rituals in promoting knowledge transfer and organizational cohesion, and be open to adapting and refining these practices based on feedback and evolving needs.

Getting involved

Business and Society

A singular presence with a global mission

REACH US

The Council on Business & Society website: www.council-business-society.org

https://cobsinsights.org/

in the-council-on-business-&-society

X @The_CoBS